Conduct a thorough audit of your existing programs and practices — the entire employee life cycle. Identify programs that wear down your workforce by contradicting the philosophies of a strengths-based culture.

- Organizations should begin by auditing all internal programs that affect the employee experience.
- The focus should be transforming programs that exist based on a deficit, weakness-oriented mind-set.
- Strengths should be incorporated into each developmental touchpoint.
- A repository for strengths resources supports coaches, champions and the overall organizational rollout.

Audit all internal programs and identify improvement opportunities to transform from a weakness-focused approach to a strengths-based approach.

Align internal and external messaging on the “why” and “how” behind strengths, giving employees the learning and tools they need to deliver on the organization’s brand promise.

Build a contingent of internal and external brand advocates who can help transform and act on the defined opportunities.

Ensure employee and manager experience alignment regarding strengths initiatives and activities.

Incorporate strengths into your employment brand, showcasing your uniqueness and differentiation and helping to attract job candidates who are the ideal “fit.”
